

Lending Market Segmentation and the Cost of Currency Integration

Taiyo Yoshimi

Abstract

This paper investigates how the costs of joining an existing monetary union, and giving up a national monetary policy, are realized when a lending market in the candidate country is left to be divorced from the existing monetary union. We find that the country-specific fluctuation in the lending rate spread leads to the cost of joining an monetary union under lending market segmentation.